

First Grand Review--Troops Passing White House on May 24, 1865

The Grand Review held here fifty years ago—May 23, 1865—showing the glorious Army of the Potomac passing in front of President Johnson's reviewing stand before the White House. The cut is reproduced from a rare lithograph which forms a part of the private collection of James F. Hood, of 1017 O street northwest.

Veterans Today Repeat Famous Review of Half-Century Ago

Only 25,000 Aged Fighters Will March Where 150,000 Victorious Young Men Trod the Path of Triumph. Fifty Thousand Visitors Saw First Review.

At 10 o'clock this morning approximately 25,000 veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic will begin the half-century celebration of what has been called "one of the most remarkable sights in the history of a modern nation"—the passing in review of 150,000 soldiers before the Chief Executive of their nation. The review of these aged warriors will take place on the review ground at the foot of the Executive Mansion, Pennsylvania avenue, from 10 o'clock to 12 o'clock on May 24 and 25, 1915.

When President Johnson saw the triumphant armies of the Potomac, Tennessee and Georgia swing past the stand in front of the White House, those men were in the full vigor of their youth. Today President Wilson will view the remnants of the Union forces, their steps not quite so vigorous, but their eyes blazing and their hearts throbbing with the same love of the united country as took them through those days of a half-century ago.

It was the suggestion of Secretary of War Stanton that brought those troops together for the Presidential review. In that march they covered the same ground that will be traversed today, from the Capitol up Pennsylvania avenue, past the Executive Mansion, Pennsylvania avenue in those days was more like a village thoroughfare than the magnificent boulevard it presents today. Fifty thousand persons from all over the North gathered here to witness the procession; today 50,000 will see the "fighting front of the North" as it passes in review.

Plans for the procession were taken up a few days after the assassination of President Lincoln. Its object was twofold: to allow the public the opportunity of paying tribute to its citizen-soldiers and to give the soldiers the chance of seeing the National Capital. The armies of the Potomac, Tennessee and Georgia were within comparatively easy marching distance from the Capital, so the orders to come to Washington were considered to be a matter of course.

VETERANS' SONS OPEN ANNUAL ENCAMPMENT

Resolution Seeking "Comprehensive Military Policy" Meets Opposition at Opening Session.

Commissioner Brownlow addressed the Sons of Veterans yesterday when their thirty-fourth annual encampment opened at the Shorham. At the same hour, in another part of the hotel, the Sons of Veterans' Auxiliary opened its encampment.

The formal opening of the encampment was in secret session, afterwards the doors were thrown open and the public admitted.

Edwin M. Ames, chief of staff, of Alton, Pa., presented a resolution asking for a "comprehensive military policy" for the United States. The resolution met with opposition and was finally referred to the committee on resolutions.

At the opening session of the Sons of Veterans' Auxiliary Mrs. Beale Bower, national president, presented a report showing that during the past year fifty-three auxiliaries have been added to the order.
